For many years, glycolipids of plants have been attracting attention as one of the components of bee venom. One of the most potent proteolytic enzymes obtained from honeybee venom is a glycosylceramidase (GSL-Cerase), which catalyzes degradation of the amide group of sphingoid bases. In this study, we found that a glycolipid fraction of griffonia simplicifolia, which was hydrolyzed by the GSL-Cerase, induced apoptosis of a human melanoma cell line, HD49256. Apoptotic chromatin condensation and morphological changes were examined, and cell cycle analysis was conducted using flow cytometry. Although several earlier studies have reported that glycolipids have antitumorigenic properties, this is the first report of an apoptosis-inducing activity of glycolipids that are hydrolyzed by the GSL-Cerase. The apoptosis induced by the griffonia glycolipid fraction was significantly inhibited
