The use of all these hacks are still in development stages. I do not guarantee any of them will work with you PC. Please try before you buy. Please note that iFunBox v1.2 will be released this month. Reboot I also upload all my software related hacks and tips on daily basis to MySpace. You can find it at the link below: Digital FunBox If you have any question or suggestion, please email me at: funboxhacks@yahoo.comQ: Why does Hash::new initialize to nil when called with no arguments? From the docs: Hash::new(default) calls the given constructor with default as its parameter, and returns the resulting value. If a block is given, it is evaluated in the context of the hash table, and the return value becomes the new value. So if I call Hash::new() or Hash::new(default: 42), why does it initialize to nil? Is this something that Ruby or the jit does? A: Its because default can be a block: Hash.new { |h,k| h[k] = 42 } # => {:foo=>42} Not sure why it doesn't want to initialize to 42, but because of the interesting use-case of block the doc seems a bit vague (or I'm missing the point) Coconut Milk and Coffee-Coconut Milkshakes I'm back. This isn't a post. Not really. Instead, it's a list of things I'm making that I didn't want to put up on the blog because they're a long ways from being the best. They're just food I want to eat. And they might be going on the blog. So yeah. I'm still loving my more permanent, seasonally-specific veggie garden. I like my produce fresh, so I try to
