Both groups had a peak increase in MCA flow after tourniquet release, with a peak increase of $40.5 \pm 11.3 \text{ mm}^3/\text{s}$ ($n = 6$) in the supine position compared with $27.3 \pm 7.8 \text{ mm}^3/\text{s}$ ($n = 8$) in the prone position ($p = 0.032$). The post-tourniquet release flow velocity was $8.6 \pm 1.4 \text{ mm/s}$ ($n = 5$) and $7.2 \pm 0.8 \text{ mm/s}$ ($n = 6$) ($p = 0.03$) for the supine and prone position, respectively (Fig. 3{ref-type="fig"}). Peak velocity of MCA. The peak velocity of MCA increased after tourniquet release in the supine position ($p = 0.032$) and tended to be higher in the prone position ($p = 0.03$). The peak velocity of MCA did not change after tourniquet release in the prone position.{#F3} The resting cerebral blood flow velocity at the MCA was not different between the supine and prone positions, $1.9 \pm 0.5 \text{ mm/s}$ ($n = 5$) and $1.7 \pm 0.4 \text{ mm/s}$ ($n = 6$), respectively ($p = 0.75$). DISCUSSION ===== The main findings of the present study were that the resting cerebral blood flow velocity was higher and the peak flow velocity after tourniquet release was lower in the prone position than in the supine position.
