... .. At that moment she was as happy as possible in her condition. She was holding the fruit of her love. This child was the meaning of her life. It was at that moment, when the baby was only a week away and she could already feel its movements, that she suddenly realized how deep and sincere her love for her husband was. It was at this time, exactly one week before the birth of the baby, that her husband began to drift away. He started staying home less and less frequently, constantly rushing around, complaining about the rush. He couldn't answer the phone, and sometimes he just turned it off. He would come in tired and as soon as we went to bed he would immediately fall asleep. Every day his condition was getting worse, he complained of weakness and malaise. "We called the doctor, he said it was overwork and prescribed rest. And he also said that it was necessary to limit stress," says the patient. It wasn't until the last appointment, when the diagnosis became clear, that it was discovered that the patient's husband had stomach cancer. There are several things in this story that immediately make me think about how we doctors behave in these cases. First, my patient did not have a single symptom that suggested there was something wrong with him: he was not eating and weighed 70 pounds. That said, we didn't see that he was dieting or receiving treatment. Also, we didn't even have any information that he was sick. At the time he was diagnosed with cancer, he was working, so he was perfectly healthy. In that case, we couldn't let him go. We have no right to make that kind of decision. - You realize yourself that he would have been able to work if he hadn't... - I know what would have happened if he hadn't gotten sick. He would have been offered a job at another plant farther away. He would have gone to England and, God forbid, he might have died. And in that situation he would have been no healthier in our eyes than when he went into the hospital. - So you, too, can be blamed for not letting him go to his family? - Yes. - You couldn't do that. You couldn't. - I don't want to. She turned abruptly, and her black eyes gleamed. - Do you like him? - No, I don't. - Don't lie. - Yes, I like him. But I don't love him. - He's a good man. I know he is. And yet you should be grateful to him. You've achieved nothing in life. But he has. You could work for him. - I wouldn't work for a man who enjoys the right of the first night. - There. Neither would he. And he wouldn't let you. He respects you. Respects you. - Respects? Do you really think so? - I've always believed that it's not just his money that's important in a man. He should respect himself. - I don't believe you. You're not like that. - She spoke slowly, uncertainly, and with difficulty in choosing her words. As if she were afraid that if she said them now, everything would fall apart. - You can't love me enough to believe in my feelings. You only love money. I'm just a means of accumulation to you. - That's not true! - He jumped up. - I don't want to hear any more fffad4f19a
