Perhaps they've even given you the suggestion of having a planned C-section, in case you have a difficult labor. However, the decision to have a C-section or an "unplanned" C-section is a personal one. It should always be up to you what kind of medical procedure you'd like to have performed on you. If you're currently pregnant and interested in learning more about an "unplanned" C-section, here are 3 lessons you'll learn if you have one. 3 Lessons You'll Learn From the Military Photo by hank-cohen on Unsplash Military service is known to be a great educational experience. This is because you're in constant training, and the hours of sleep and food are severely limited. The benefits of military service are well-known and proven, as are the costs involved. It also gives you an experience of loyalty to the country, and the importance of showing up on time. However, most women consider military service for just a short time when deciding to have a C-section. Let's face it; when you're pregnant, sleep is usually hard to come by. Whether you're at home or in the hospital, there's no 2d92ce491b
