Review of codeine, hydrocodone, and tramadol.1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a protective liner for the open end of a cable. In particular, this invention relates to a fiber optic cable in combination with a flexible tube that is impervious to water. 2. Background Information In the telecommunications industry, fiber optic cables are often run underground for significant lengths. In some cases, the fiber optic cable extends from a head-end facility into a fiber optic distribution hub (FODH) that distributes the light to subscribers located in a distribution loop. In order to protect the cable from water, such as that that may be introduced at the cable's end, the cable is usually enclosed in a tube. The tube extends around the cable and is closed at the end by splicing the cable to a terminal. The tube is typically filled with a water-resistant material to prevent ingress of water into the cable. In particular, the water-resistant material provides a water barrier at the cable's end to prevent water from entering the cable. Some known tubes do not have a water-tight seal at the cable end, and thus allow water to enter the cable. Other tubes may have a water-tight seal at the cable end, but they are not well suited for containing the fiber optic cable and are not easily installed into the tube. For example, some known tubes are provided with radially-extending fold lines that allow the tube to be folded for transport and storage. However, a fiber optic cable with a terminal usually needs to be pressed into such a tube with a certain amount of force to achieve a water-tight seal. However, the amount of force needed to fold the tube can cause the tube to tear along the fold line, thereby damaging the cable and necessitating a replacement. In addition, such tubes cannot easily be transported, stored, or shipped, because they are made of corrugated paper or cardboard. Another known type of end closure for a fiber optic cable is a rigid section that encloses the end of the cable and provides a water-tight seal. However, such rigid sections are
