Known for her green-tinted lifestyle blog, which was born out of her love for makeup and penchant for vegetable prints, the model and author of Moxie Diva has also been cutting brightly colored nails since 2015. True to her no-nonsense approach, she believes DIY manicures are her favorite way to kick off a new look, but she has experimented with everything from splashes of gold to raw-edge designs in her beloved greige cremes. For spring, she is channeling her love for the ocean — and her favorite color, cobalt — with pale green creme, adorned with four cool colored sandstone stones. “The days are definitely getting longer, and the prospect of long ocean walks have me feeling a little more motivated to get up and get going, so I decided to experiment with my manicure,” she says. “I was lying around the house, feeling lazy, when I picked up my polish stash from when I was doing a green-tinted manicure, so I decided to look at some new colors, which led me to the Pomegranate Nails by Sensation polishes. I love the vibrant color, and it's a favorite of mine, but I couldn't get the right shade of green. Then, I stumbled upon the base ‘Mud’ as a bare-bones color with

This has been accomplished by the expert technical contributions of the Baylor College of Medicine and The Jackson Laboratory (TJL) laboratories with the support of Anatomic Pathology Histology Core (APHC) personnel. This resource was formally opened to the community as a service by the PCMR in 1999. Together the PCMR and the APHC have made this resource publicly available to the entire research community by providing a low-cost service where all morphological data (histology and in vivo imaging) may be correlated with the cell biology.
