Many industrial processes, such as oil refinery, petroleum mining and petrochemical processes, produce effluent containing crude oil and water, which is usually referred to as oil-water emulsion. The emulsified crude oil and water water is then recycled for reuse in the process or discharged. There are various devices that can be used to treat the emulsion, such as centrifuges, gravity separators and hydrocyclones. These devices treat the emulsion by separating water from crude oil and, if required, by removing suspended sediment particles. When treating the emulsion, the emulsified crude oil is not generally separated from the water, but instead is mixed with the water and sediment. Therefore, the sediment-free water is generally treated to remove the emulsified crude oil before the water is recycled or discharged, and the emulsified crude oil is generally treated with a surfactant to emulsify the water and to disperse the emulsified crude oil in the water. The water treated in the oil-water separation and sediment removal processes is called permeate. The permeate, which typically contains 2-10% of crude oil, can be recycled to the process. The oil-wate
