The present invention generally relates to a system and a method for characterizing a system. Vehicles have become increasingly sophisticated, resulting in increasingly complex computers that control vehicles. By way of example, vehicles having on-board diagnosis systems that detect failures of electronic components are now available. The on-board diagnosis systems include, by way of example, electronic control units (ECUs) that may be used to control, for example, the operation of engine components of the vehicle. The ECUs may be configured to perform any of a variety of diagnostic operations, including ensuring proper operation of the various vehicle components. Various diagnostic functions of the ECU may be performed based on one or more settings that are created by a vehicle operator (e.g., a driver). The settings typically are time-dependent. For example, the settings may have a time delay that causes the diagnostic functions to begin operating after a certain amount of time has passed. As another example, some operating conditions of the vehicle may affect whether the diagnostic functions can be performed on the vehicle. For example, the ECU may be designed to detect faults when certain operating conditions are satisfied. However, the ECU may not function properly when the vehicle is operated under a particular operating condition and, thus, may not be able to perform any of the diagnostic functions. Diagnostic functions may be performed on the vehicle based on the various settings that are utilized by the vehicle operator. In some examples, the settings are based on the information that the vehicle operator has provided to a system (e.g., a device or component) of the vehicle. 3e33713323
