The latest news of the expanded use of inorganic porous materials as solid oxide fuel cells (SOFC) anodes originated in the US and Europe. So far, the main focus in the use of inorganic porous materials has been on the development of SOFCs with the highest possible oxygen activity on the anode side. For the cathode side, on the other hand, oxide materials containing metals of the 3d-series have been used for a long time, the main focus being for example the hydrogen oxidation reaction. The development of low cost and highly active oxygen reduction catalysts is, however, still in a very early stage. In contrast to the development of high-performance anodes and cathodes, a far more concerted effort has been undertaken in recent years to develop low cost manufacturing technologies. Just recently, a need for combination of the oxygen reduction catalysis and anode development has been emphasized by the interest in hydrogen oxidation fuel cells. On the cathode side, the use of high-temperature stable oxides has been thoroughly explored with the result that, in addition to Li-containing oxides, the most promising oxide electrode materials nowadays are N 3e33713323
