They penetrated the impenetrable undergrowth and suddenly, above their heads, they saw a vast and unknown realm of sky. They gazed at the blue expanse and at the sky which is so close that they did not realize they were so close. It was then that one of the hunters broke through the underbrush and looked up and said, in wonder: ‘It is as if we are suspended in the sky.” That is a quote from a book I read today by Jill Lepore and I feel very fortunate that I got it in today’s paper. It is a quote from a book called “Winter World,” and it is about a group of Alaskan Eskimos who visit Alaska for the first time, and discover that they are really not Alaskan at all, but actually Eskimos. The book isn’t fiction. It is written by a retired teacher, and I like that. I like that someone went and found this tribe of Eskimos who really do exist, and wrote about them and showed us, in his own words, how their life is. The kids who were in this book were abducted in the mid-1990s, when they were eight and nine years old. They were taken from their mother in South Africa, and sold to two Eskimo-tribe owners in the United States, where they have been living ever since. They are now in their 20s.
