Analytical methods for the control of cocaine and cocaine metabolites in oral fluid. In recent years, numerous studies have examined the potential of oral fluid (OF) as a matrix for the analysis of illegal drugs, including cocaine and its metabolites. The most common assay technique for determining cocaine and cocaine metabolites in OF is the enzyme multiplied immunoassay technique (EMIT), which is used in the majority of cases for the analysis of crack-cocaine smoke. Recent evidence suggests that the EMIT should not be used for the quantitative analysis of cocaine in OF. The performance of the EMIT was compared with gas chromatography/mass spectrometry (GC/MS) for analysis of cocaine and cocaine metabolites in oral fluid and plasma samples. The reliability of the EMIT was evaluated using spiked OF samples, previously tested cocaine-positive samples, and samples from crack-cocaine-smoking patients. The EMIT showed a bias of +43% for the detection of cocaine and cocaine metabolites in OF. Samples in which the EMIT failed to detect cocaine showed consistently lower concentrations than those detected by GC/MS. These findings indicate that the EMIT should not be used to quantitate cocaine in oral fluid. Oral fluid testing of cocaine and cocaine metabolites should be performed using GC/MS.Q: How to delete a string from a random array?
