I'm looking forward to trying it out for the first time and reaping the benefits. To date, PowerShell 3.0 has received rave reviews and I think that the minor changes and additions in 4.0 are here to stay, so I'm happy with the direction. I do think it's unfortunate that the ratings for PowerShell 3.0 are much more varied than those for 4.0. Generally, the added features and improvements are well regarded, but the sentiment on PowerShell 2.0 is lukewarm to negative. But what makes PowerShell 4.0 a good update? First, there are quite a few minor changes that aim to make it easier to code and to be productive. To me, the most impactful is the introduction of the cmdlet Get-Alias – this makes it much easier to type PowerShell code directly into a file. I've found this to be one of the most abused features in PowerShell, and the fact that it's now included in the core means that we'll get additional uses out of it. The other two additions that I've seen a number of people using are the -IsArray parameter to the Get-Command cmdlet, and the fact that you can now change the name of a function by using the -functionname parameter to the Set-StrictMode cmdlet. A more obviously major change is the addition of automation technologies, such as providers and functions. With this release, PowerShell goes beyond the basic Automation API to expose a full framework for software developers. The goals of this initiative are to make developers work with PowerShell in the same 55cdc1ed1c
