I'm currently using the Azure IoT Core SDK to talk to the Azure IOT Hub via C#. The API documentation here states "The IoT Hub generates a SSL certificate at the time of tenant creation based on the certificate and private key provided at that time. This certificate is valid only for the user that owns the certificate and private key. Consequently, any IoT Hub certificates generated by other users expire within a week and the resulting failures must be manually retrieved and resubmitted with a new certificate. If the private key of the certificate changes, the certificate must be retrieved, the old private key must be removed, and the new certificate must be reissued. For more information about IoT Hub certificate lifecycle, see "Certificates in Azure IoT Hub." This seems to suggest that in order to keep the SSL certificate at the hub level valid, I need to reissue the certificate every week. I'm somewhat confused on best practice, in that from what I understand (and I'm just starting out) a number of things come together to keep an IoT Hub working. The process for creating a new hub gets a cert, so that's not the issue, but the overall certificate in Azure is updated when the private keys are updated, so I'm confused on what to have updating the certs at the hub level. A: I'm not sure about Azure IoT, but in general, you would want to issue a new Certificate whenever the user's private key changes. For IoT this is relatively simple, as the hub is basically a CA. To issue a new certificate it suffices for the hub to generate and sign a new CSR (Client Request for Certificate), and give that new CSR to the user. That's sufficient to renew the certificate, as the process of obtaining the CSR was the same as originally generating the certificate. You might want to look into the CSC API to see how it is implemented in other operating systems (allot.c). Note that the process to renew a CA requires issuance of

I have seen a quote from an organisation that they use the Snow Leopard seal, which was available as a certificate, and you could digitally sign your software with it. What I was interested to know is the exact name of the seal and also the exact implementation details. A: 3da54e8ca3
