Academy's Excel option trading practice test app helps students with their work for the finance and investment help online courses offered by the University. The tests are in a series of ten questions each which have a similar scenario and students must choose the best option for their scenario. Students can test their knowledge within the course and gain full marks for each correct answer. This version of the application, installed on Google android, is a modified version of the existing Excel option trading app with some features removed and addition of contact list. The modified app is done to simplify the process of downloading the score report card from the blog on the official website, to taking a printout of the score cards from the app and then upload it to the blog's server for tracking and completion report. The application is also done to make the app easy to use for the user by enabling them to use the Excel keyboard shortcut on their android devices. If you wish to learn how to access the score card for a set of above mentioned course, then you can refer to the blog on the official site, which provides complete information on the exam patterns, the testing schedule and the top scores for all the options trading courses at the University. For now, you can test the app from the below download link for android and windows platforms. This version of the app comes with the google play upgrade option, which allows the users to purchase in-app upgrades. Upon upgrading to the new version, the users will be able to download various new features and use them in the course.

Parametric modeling of basilar artery atherosclerosis development with blood flow shear stress. The development of basilar artery atherosclerosis (BAAS) is a complex, flow-dependent, macroscopic multiscale process involving both capillary and arterial components. The aim of this paper is to develop a new three-scale mathematical model capable of predicting a detailed structure of three-dimensional microcirculation in the walls of basilar artery, and then to study BAAS development based on this model. The microcirculatory model is based on the special-purpose computer code for multiscale continuum models (MULIC), and the mathematical model is constructed using the Finite Element Method. The three-scale model represents the vessel wall in order to predict the blood flow and shear stress in the vascular wall. The simulation results show that as the sectional area of the artery enlarges, the area of high wall stress gradually increases and vascular smooth muscle cells
