Psychometric properties of the Reasons for Current Psychiatric Diagnoses and Treatment (RESCOD) Inventory. This study aimed to (a) determine the factor structure of the Reasons for Current Psychiatric Diagnoses and Treatment (RESCOD) Inventory, a measure to assess reasons for a person's current psychiatric diagnoses and treatment, (b) evaluate its reliability and validity, and (c) examine its association with mental health measures. Data from 438 participants in the longitudinal MacArthur Successful Aging Study, a community-based longitudinal study of older adults in the Northeastern United States (baseline n = 391, follow-up n = 121, response rate = 54%), were used for this study. Correlational analysis was used to assess construct validity and convergent and divergent validity. Confirmatory factor analysis was used to evaluate the model. Internal consistency reliability of the scale was tested using Cronbach's alpha. The Reasons for Current Psychiatric Diagnoses and Treatment Inventory, comprised of 20 items, comprises a four-factor structure, and the six subscales: "symptoms of disease," "environmental impact of symptoms," "fear or avoidance," "belief of noncure," "experience of symptom cure," and "stigma." Strong levels of internal consistency reliability were found for all six subscales of the Reasons for Current Psychiatric Diagnoses and Treatment Inventory. Exploratory factor analysis revealed that the scale's subscales are conceptually distinct and have good construct validity. The scale showed significant and moderate correlations with anxiety and depression symptoms, social support, and support from friends or family. These findings suggest that the Reasons for Current Psychiatric Diagnoses and Treatment Inventory is a valid, reliable, and feasible measure of reasons for a person's current psychiatric diagnoses and treatment. Further research is needed to evaluate its potential use in clinical practice and research.

McCain and Obama huddle with what's left of foreign policy Earlier this week, the Supreme Court heard a most unlikely debate about whether the constitutional principle of federalism means that the federal government can impose a single standard for an entire state. It involved Arizona's courageous, if not very bright, new chief law-enforcement officer, Jay "We're Not Sorry" Len Knightly. You can probably still watch the oral argument here. But the case of McCain v. Graham reminds us that states have other enemies — ones that are a lot more insidious than the evil Mr. Knightly. By contrast, Mr. McCain and Mr
