1st Atomic Time is a small utility designed to keep the computer accurate in time. It synchronizes time with atomic clocks on the Internet, and adjusts the PC clock according to the time from the fastest servers. You can choose a server that you like from the built-in list of over 150 choices. If a server is down, the next best server will be tried. If none of the servers can be reached, 1st Atomic Time will obtain a network dial-up connection so that it can retrieve the time. You can set 1st Atomic Time to automatically adjust the time at specified intervals, and schedule the automatic time changes to happen at Windows startup, to minimize resources consumed by the program. You can also choose to have 1st Atomic Time synchronize the time when a dial-up connection is established. You can configure 1st Atomic Time to operate as a time server so that others in your network can connect to your computer with accurate time information. Version 3.02-1.1.2 See for more details.
