terbium-doped silicate glass. A detailed study on the influence of temperature on the thermoluminescence (TL) of terbium-doped silicate glasses was performed. The results showed that a single TL peak and a small amount of weak TL peaks at around 450 °C were observed in Tb³⁺-doped silicate glasses. For Tb³⁺/Ca²⁺ co-doped silicate glasses, the formation of the Tb₂CaO₄ phase was detected by X-ray diffraction, and four TL peaks were observed at temperatures between 330 and 380 °C. With an increase of temperature, the TL intensity decreased, and the peak positions did not change. The TL spectra of the samples also showed some similarity at different temperatures.

Q: Is a string with a list containing a single item a hash? Suppose we have a simple hash table in

Python: class

TestHashTable: def
__init__(self): self.table = { } def insert(self, key, value): self.table[key] = value def get(self, key):
return self.table[key]

Now, what happens when we use a dictionary? Can it be used as a hash table?

What about lists? $x = [1,$

2, 3] Would we use `x` as a hash key? A: There are two ways to look at this.

If you treat hash tables as the collections of linked lists, then Python has no built-in hash function, and you need to compute the hash key yourself. In that case, Python cannot help you. See, for instance, this

Stack Overflow answer:
What are some good hash functions for python? The second way to look at this is that Python uses a built-in hash function, named hash, which works on Python objects. This
