It could be that going through the motions of life while focused inward is the better option. But we can't allow ourselves to get so bogged down in thoughts of the past that we cease to be. We must ask ourselves, what is my present state of being? What am I doing now? What is my heart telling me to do? Are the decisions I am making serving and reflecting my highest values? We can so easily get caught up in the business of life - the continual distractions, the work, the obligations, the stresses, and the responsibilities that life throws our way. Are we allowing ourselves to be propelled by a force from within that is in complete alignment with who we are as divine beings? If not, we are a missing part of a larger whole, and we can never really be happy. Let's not miss this opportunity to find our way back. 05a79cecff

The goal of this project is to provide a world-class central neuroscience microelectrode array (MEA) hub, for the dissemination and use of novel microelectrode array (MEA) technology among our partners and colleagues worldwide. The core technology is an FAST (Field Addressable Semi-Conductor Trap) chip comprised of a high density array of microelectrodes, each of which can individually store charge to discriminate among neurons, which in turn can be used to localize the activity of a multi-cellular brain ensemble. This core technology is based on a 30 year NIH-funded venture, in which a long lead prototype design was made, deployed for preliminary testing, field- tested, and extensively validated (Curtis, and others). Currently a dual-chip (HEKA chip-kit) is being developed to greatly expand the functionality of our single device (Curtis), and to also provide a powerful, inexpensive, and reliable (snap-in chip-kit) device for use in the developing world and in small laboratories. This project includes all aspects of design, fabrication, assembly, pre- and post-clinical testing, packaging, and quality control. It also includes training, engagement of new users, dissemination, and long-term support. The core applies new techniques for both the MEA and the emitter, and is optimized for electrical stimulation from both the top and the bottom. The core will be fully integrated and user-friendly, and will be supplemented by a comprehensive user group (UG) web site and repository that will serve as a major resource for information on the MEA technology, and an educational resource that promotes training and dissemination. It will serve as a primary hub for information on the product and its background. The specific aims are: 1) Devise a new approach to making planar array devices suitable for long-term implantation by developing robust, well-suited devices for implantation in the brain, and a technique of shaping electrodes to obtain high fidelity recording, and to enhance the efficacy of electrical stimulation, while ensuring safe and reliable uses for such devices; 2) Improve the performance, reliability, and user-friendliness of our MEA device for use with single and multiple cells; 3) Develop, rigorously test, and validate techniques for cell loading, survival, and recording/stimulation of cells with our MEA; and 4) Educate the scientific community and the public about the feasibility of using our MEA technology to explore the human brain and treat

Juniper trees in the forests of central Minnesota look like they could never be disturbed by an axe. The foliage, which does not grow much larger than a dog's ear, is an unattractive shade of brown and speckled. But the juniper trees are acting like sorority sisters. Each year, a handful of the mutant trees bend and twist into a kind of knot – the trunk itself becomes completely covered by the spreading fronds. I can't tell you how many times I've been standing on a trail in the woods and noticed one of these trees. It reminds me of those little elf costumes that children wear over their clothes as part of their Halloween ensemble. As one watches the limbs spreading, the "lady's" or "gentleman's" skirt inflates to resemble a couple of old ladies' dresses. The

Juniper Outrage Thanks to an unassuming 24-year-old Minnesota man, Juniper trees are now facing increasing attention. In the fall of 2014, Ari Ansari won a radio contest that promised him a public space on the grounds of the Minnesota State Fair. There, he erected a sign on the grounds of the fair telling the world that he had purchased the Juniper Outrage. The Juniper Outrage, as he calls it, is a massive juniper plant that grows out of the trunk of an area juniper tree. Ansari, a postdoctoral fellow who works at the University of Minnesota, began to install the tree in 2014. Now, the Juniper Outrage is nearly as tall as a 10-story building. The growth was too much for some of the newly added branches. As that happened, the tree's dense foliage became so thick that it's no longer exposed. It sits in a flat, silent canopy of green. The Juniper Outrage. Ari Ansari. Ansari. The tree's appearance at the Minnesota State Fair – a place that attracts thousands of people every year – was a success from the moment it was erected. "The tree was a huge hit," said Ansari. "It was a big deal." Why the Juniper Outrage is so popular is not clear. But it's a curious tree that has become something of
