

“Developing this technology to make the player feel like they are the ones running on the pitch and moving in and out of the action has been a huge challenge,” says Craig Tiley, Senior Producer of gameplay at EA Sports. “The revolutionary motion-capture process allowed us to capture the players’ movements in a way that had never been possible before. A player in full, realistic-looking motion captures out and into their runs, sprints and tackles. Their movements have real-world, physical depth and realism. This technology has now allowed us to construct the best in-game player models and physics, which players can use to predict how a player will move across the pitch.” Activated by simply tapping any part of a player’s body, the HyperMotion system allows the player to travel the length of the pitch. Players can trigger the effect from the player’s left foot or right foot depending on which pass they take on the pitch. One of the key features of the game has been the introduction of the “FIFA Pass,” which is one of the most important additions to the game since the introduction of new defensive skills in FIFA 17. The game uses near-perfect pitch prediction and creates a situation that allows the player to choose the right pass with a lot of autonomy, creating more realistic gameplay. Recreation of a FIFA 22 game day Players also now get to choose what direction they want their passes to come from by tilting the device at the start of a possession. The same is true for near-perfect acceleration and speed variation, which are examples of new advancements in the HyperMotion engine. “FIFA Passes are the game of the future and the reason why you can run the length of the pitch like never before is because we’ve created a range of passes that give players the choice to really influence the direction that the ball goes in,” says Tiley. “Whether you want to a cross or a pass to a team-mate who is on the opposite wing to you, you can control the direction of play very precisely to perfection. Our commitment to making the game perfect is what has enabled us to introduce this new technology.” The FIFA 22 gameplay is in a state of ongoing development, with changes being made and refined daily. “We’re constantly making adjustments to the game to provide players with a
