Abstract Diabetes and obesity is a chronic condition affecting 6.3% and 3.5% of the general population in China respectively. It is frequently associated with the development of vascular complications including vascular calcification. This study aimed to investigate the association of vascular calcification with the lipid metabolism in diabetic patients. A cross-sectional study was conducted in 400 patients with type 2 diabetes mellitus (T2DM) in Anhui province, China, using the data from the Anhui Diabetes and Vascular Calcification Study. The vascular calcification index was determined by an on-site ultrasound measuring the degree of arterial wall calcification. Diabetes duration, blood pressure, lipid metabolism, metabolic acidosis, C-reactive protein (CRP) were determined by questionnaire, and blood and urine samples were used for biochemical measurements. A total of 144 patients (34.5%) were diagnosed with vascular calcification. The median (25th, 75th percentile) values for age, body mass index (BMI), and duration of diabetes were 58.3 (54.8, 66.5) years, 27.2 (25.3, 30.3) kg/m2, and 10.6 (5.0, 15.9) years respectively. High-density lipoprotein cholesterol (HDL-C) level was negatively associated with the vascular calcification index (P=0.027), whereas low-density lipoprotein cholesterol (LDL-C) and triglyceride (TG) levels were positively associated (P=0.036 and 0.
