Contents Creating images There are three main image formats supported by Photoshop: TIFF, JPEG, and PNG. If you want to create a raw format of your own, you can do this by selecting the "File" menu and selecting "Export." This is used to produce the most basic raw image format, RGB or CMYK, depending on the color space you selected when you imported the image. Photoshop also supports the Windows Advanced Photo System (APS) format for archiving raw files, which can be converted to other file types by selecting the "File" menu and selecting "Convert to..." Other file formats can also be used, including GIF (Graphics Interchange Format), vector, and HTML. When saving a file, it's important to note that when you save an image into the.PSD,.AI, or.EPS file format, or into the.RAW format, you're entering a compressed file. Compressed files can be made smaller. There are advantages and disadvantages to a compressed file, but there are many ways to resolve or mitigate the effects. When we say that your image file is.PSD,.AI, or.EPS, or.PDF (for Acrobat), we mean that the file was saved after the image was processed in Photoshop. This is an editable file that is much like any other open-source design file. For more on how to edit PSD files, please click here. Learning Photoshop It is important to understand what Photoshop does and how each tool works. Many beginners want to edit the color scheme of an image, but know little about the underlying concepts. While it is possible to do that in Photoshop, it is a slow process. While it is possible to achieve the same result by using a number of the tools that Photoshop has available, it is much faster to learn how to use the application and how each tool works. This will get you to a point where you can make the image you want quicker. Composition Choosing a composition in Photoshop is the first step to designing a successful image. Choosing a composition can entail many things, from the layout of the image itself, the positioning and emphasis of elements, and the scale of the image. Choosing a composition well involves two things: first, making sure your subject is the most important part of the image; and second, setting it so that it is of a respectable

Q: What is this "serve" word means? I'm not familiar with the word "serve" or "serving." I have seen this sentence at a website. This document is a serving of this document. A: No, it is not a serving of anything. It is serving a purpose (see definition 2 below). It is a metaphor. I think the writer is trying to state "This is a copy of the document." 1. Serve (as a verb): Purpose: a. provide or provide for the benefit of (a person or thing) b. be suitable for or appropriate to (a person or thing): i. it serves to make money ii. his acting serves well as a comedic lead c. give a person power or authority. Usage notes: 2. serve (a purpose): a. give assistance: i. a serving wife was the perfect companion. ii. serving an apprenticeship made him realize his goals. b. contribute to the welfare of: i. we are serving time for this crime. ii. the celebration serves as a sort of tribute to her father. Source: A: A "serving" as used in this sentence is a metaphor (my own words) for an action. It's like you being "served" a meal, and somebody else prepared it for you. A: I'll add a couple more things I think are worth noting. A serving as a noun is a person who serves your needs. This can be used when you are serving food to someone. Sometimes when speaking of a person being served they can also use the word serving as a verb. It is common in some dialects to use serving as a verb to describe "being served." This is common in some North Carolina rural areas. To my ear it sounds very different. I think it sounds like the person's name is being used as the noun serving rather than the "serving" of the food. This is my serving of your lunch. (I would probably use "yours" here) This is a serving of this document. This is a copy of the document. This is my copy

ACR20: an improved end point for rheumatoid arthritis clinical trials. The American College of Rheumatology (ACR) has released revised criteria for the ACR20 response in rheumatoid arthritis (RA). The ACR recommendations state that the ACR20 response should be measured after 20 weeks and that, for the ACR20 response to be considered achieved, the patient must achieve three of five improvement criteria. This article explores the principles involved in the decision to abandon the original ACR20 criteria in favor of the revised (i.e., the new ACR20) criteria and critically reviews the evidence to support these recommendations. In particular, the authors recommend more careful design of therapeutic trials in RA and assert that the new ACR20 response criteria may overstate the effect of biologic agents on the disease course of RA.[Intracranial arterial aneurysm: emergency treatment with placement of an intracranial stent]. Aneurysms of the internal carotid artery are sometimes asymptomatic and for this reason are only detected incidentally during brain imaging studies. When the patient presents with a subarachnoid hemorrhage, the risk of re-bleeding is higher than in those with an asymptomatic aneurysm, and the outcome is poorer. We describe the case of a 63-year-old male patient with a large ruptured left internal carotid artery aneurysm who underwent a successful emergency treatment with placement of an intracranial stent, associated with a cervical aneurysm clip. The clinical course was satisfactory and the aneurysm disappeared on the follow-up angiography. This case illustrates the possibility of using intracranial stents as an alternative to surgical treatment in the cases of patients with giant ruptured aneurysms, with the aim of obtaining an immediate decompression of the lesion and reducing the risk of re-bleeding.Michael Lamm Michael Lamm is the current director of the Lamm Center for Entrepreneurial Journalism at the University of South Carolina Upstate.
