Â .Q: Practical use of alternative approaches to OOP? I've recently begun studying object-oriented programming, and I'm having trouble understanding how I can use something like C#'s asynchronous APIs (without using background threads) to achieve some of the goals of OOP that I've been reading about (practical thread safety, MVC, etc.). I've always been a somewhat pragmatic programmer who likes to figure out how a language solves a particular problem, and the way I've been thinking about this is that there's three things in the OOP world: Data Methods Objects C#'s async APIs allow me to treat methods as objects. Is it possible to treat your application as objects (especially classes) in a practical way when you have to use something like the .NET Asynchronous Programming Model? A: The C# Asynchronous Programming Model is pretty much exactly that - an asynchronous model. It is a new model that replaces the old TPL model. It allows to call async methods as if they were sync ones. That allows you to do almost everything an asynchronous model would allow you to do. On the other hand, an asynchronous model has some problems: it can have its own problems: for example, your threads may be loaded for only short time intervals because their AsyncAction methods are executed for long time intervals. there are certain constraints, for example you cannot use it with Task.Delay as an asynchronous Task, only with ConfigureAwait(false). Both of these problems are perfectly solvable, and if you consider the asynchronous programming model together with the Task Parallel Library, you can more easily find a compromise between a performance and some other issues. The Async Programming Model has not supplanted the Task Parallel Library yet; they are both complementary. Q: Why was this question blocked? I don't understand why this question was blocked. It is a question on a phenomenon in our daily lives. Why is it wrong? A: It was flagged as too broad - a problem has a definite answer. I also removed any hints as

It is difficult to imagine how the number of cops on the scene would have been diminished if the officers had not been engaged in conduct that took precedence over the "narrow question" of whether to allow Corley to proceed peacefully. In Brower, the Court held that the government had a "special relationship" with the motorist who collided with the victim's car at the side of the highway where the accident occurred.

In the context of an intracustody automobile accident, the Brower opinion held that the police had a duty to keep the driver and the passengers safe. The opinion specified the circumstances in which the duty arose: [P]rompt and effective aid is available to all... who suffer a [traffic] accident... [and][t]he likelihood that a particular accident may occur
