SACRAMENTO — California's largest domestic violence shelters are having to remove beds from their emergency rooms because the Legislature did not provide them with an adequate budget for the federal Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program. San Diego County's Family Violence Prevention and Treatment program at the center of the state's largest domestic violence shelter, Zanja LaMar, is receiving only about $1 million in state dollars this fiscal year, well below the $9.9 million that the county needs to provide shelter space. In a letter to the Senate, the Shelter Association of San Diego County, which is based at the LaMar Center, said that it had to turn away 812 clients last year from its emergency room and intensive case management program, as well as about 4,000 clients during the previous fiscal year. In fiscal year 2014-15, the program saw its client load increase by 15%, according to the letter. Submit No Thanks, courts and justice systems to try an individual. With the commitment of everyone involved, it is just an outside possibility that something bad might happen to the person. And if something bad happens, things may not be over and done with. There is no change-the person is still on parole. There is no change-the person is still under court order. There is no change-the person is still under supervision. There is no change-the person's probation is still being served. So what should be the solution here? If the person is no longer on probation, and parole, and court supervision then you have to ask yourself, 'who has the responsibility for what happens next?' Well, there is no change that person cannot commit another crime. Sometimes, it is easy to cross over into a darker spot in people's hearts and minds when things are said in the way they were when we were all young. But it has to be said that there are not many people who are not on probation, or parole, or court supervision who do not commit another crime. Even if it
