It has origins in the late 1980s, when musicians who wanted to play music in the intimate settings of pubs and coffee houses formed large bands and began to use pickup lines as an integral part of the music they played. The band's set lists may cover any type of music, usually beginning with the "standard rock band format" and moving into jazz, R&B, and hip-hop genres as the night progresses. Traditional rock songs are used to put the audience at ease; only after the audience has become more familiar with the band's performance will they be shown songs they are not familiar with. The band's music is usually loud, and at a volume where all instruments may be heard at once. ConcertBand audiences do not usually want to hear a band all the way through; instead, the concert is often split into several sets, each set consisting of several songs. Each set usually begins with a pick-up line and a rock song, and may end with the end of a song. As the concert progresses, most frequently, the audience listens to a large number of sets, Beginning with sets that showcase the musicians' versatility, as well as the musicians' ability to play and sing in key, they will play faster and heavier music until they play slower, softer, and more melodic music for the later sets. The requirement of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D3 (1,25(OH)2D3) in promoting differentiation in the mouse conceptus was recently shown to involve activation of protein kinase C (PKC) isoforms, which have been implicated in differentiation and apoptosis in other cell systems. To determine whether 1,25(OH)2D3, required for differentiation in the postimplantation embryo, also requires PKC activation, the temporal and spatial expression of seven isoforms of PKC in the 15-day postimplantation rat embryo was compared by Western blot analysis. One isoform, PKCdelta, was found to be expressed in all tissues and cell types of the rat embryo at all stages examined, but PKCepsilon was constitutively expressed in the brain. In addition to the finding that PKCdelta is constitutively expressed 648931e174
