In order to reduce the amount of a liquid emulsion required for manufacturing a liquid emulsion, the liquid container is frequently driven by a motor as its agitator. However, there is a possibility that the agitator fails to agitate the liquid emulsion supplied to the liquid container due to an influence of the viscosity of the liquid emulsion or the like. In this case, foam generated by being mixed with the liquid emulsion by the agitator or the like occurs in the liquid emulsion. In order to suppress the foam generation, Japanese Patent Laid-open Publication No. 2012-258357 (“the '357 application”) proposes a method for calculating an amount of the foam generated by detecting a foam amount generated and sequentially controlling a rotation speed of a liquid emulsion pump in the liquid container on the basis of the foam amount thus calculated. However, the foam amount detected by the method described in the '357 application may change due to a change in an ambient temperature. Accordingly, it is sometimes difficult to control the agitator on the basis of the foam amount calculated by the foam amount detecting method disclosed in the '357 application, and there is a possibility that the foam may be generated due to a continuous operation of the liquid emulsion pump.
