Figure 3.6a : Photoshop layers enable you to apply different attributes to different layers. You can create layers in the Photoshop application itself. To apply multiple layers on a single image, you must create a new layer for each layer you want to apply; you cannot apply one layer to a group of images. Figure 3.6b shows two working layers—a watermark layer and an applied image layer. Notice that both layers are below the Background layer. The watermark layer holds an image within a transparent box; the applied image layer shows an image within a solid-color box. When you create a new layer, you can also apply a color or brush to it. You can also apply an image as a layer. Images created in Photoshop can be converted into layers; a captured image can be a layer, and a drawn image can be a layer.

Q: Dealing with a X-Frame-Options/frame-ancestors'sameorigin' policy violation? We're looking to develop a web app for a client that needs to be viewed cross-domain, but without people getting the internal admin console when they load the external site. Currently, I have a solution working: we just implement "login" screens on our own domain, and instead of relying on cookies, the javascript on the app admin page uses localStorage to pass the login info through to the correct "master" site. It's annoying to implement, but it works. Our problem is that on Chrome (and possibly other browsers), the site we're after is being served over https: and our backend is only serving over http:. This is because the client is looking to use CORS to allow the page to be viewed cross-domain. After setting the X-Frame-Options to sameorigin, the problem seems to have gone away: if I add in the following meta tag to the page: I get a blank page, but if I don't add the content tag, it works. I don't know enough about X-Frame-Options to work out if this is a bug or if it's working as designed. I'm using Chrome version 36.0.1985.125 m, and if I add the meta tag, have a standard non-secure Chrome network tab open to the target page. Is this expected behaviour? I'd also be happy if anyone can provide details on how Chrome's X-Frame-Options enforcement works in this scenario - it doesn't seem to fail silently if the a page isn't served over SSL, is it rather that it's refused to load? A: It's not a bug. If you look at the code for http.server.js at Chromium: // Disallow access to origins which declare themselves insecure. That's why it didn't work for your server. The browser will "allow" them, but will block you, unless you explicitly allow it. So, it does not "work as designed". If the page is it can't be loaded in iframe from (or

Treatment of actinic keratoses with a combination of alpha-interferon 2b and 5-fluorouracil, followed by radiotherapy. The combination of alpha-interferon 2b (Intron A) and 5-fluorouracil (5-FU) (Laronid) has demonstrated efficacy in the treatment of several skin tumours. In this phase II clinical study, 32 patients with two or more large 'field' actinic keratoses (AK) were treated with twice daily application of Intron A for 10 weeks followed by treatment of the residual or residual and new lesions with three weekly 'optimal' doses of 5-FU. Using the patients' assessments, the objective response rate was 92%, and the overall subjective response rate was 91%. Fourteen of the 15 patients who completed the study were 'cured' by the end of the study. The mean duration of follow-up was 17.7 months. Only one patient had a recurrence of AK 3 months after therapy and that patient was referred for surgery. Skin toxicity, as measured by a regimen-specific toxicities scale, was a significant problem. One subject withdrew during the second week of treatment due to both the irritant and immuno-suppressive effects of 5-FU. To determine whether the addition of radiotherapy would further improve the treatment results, 25 patients who had completed 10 weeks' treatment with the combination therapy were randomized to treatment with either 5-FU monotherapy or the combination of 5-FU with low-dose radiotherapy (3 x 5 Gy 5-FU and 1.5 x 5 Gy 5-FU + 5 Gy single fraction radiotherapy). The objective response rate for the combination therapy was 92%, and the combined subjective and objective response rate was 96%. The combination of 5-FU and low-dose radiotherapy was tolerated much better than the combination of 5-FU with Intron A, but the results were no better. The duration of follow-up in this group was only 3 months. Influence of the temperature profile across the air-cathode of a single-chamber microbial fuel cell. A mathematical model to predict the voltage and power output from a single-chamber air-cathode microbial fuel cell (SCAMFC) was developed. The temperature profile across the air-cathode was calculated as a function of current density and as a measure of activity. The model was used to show that the maximum power and maximum voltage output of
