1. 1. Open a favorite photo and save it as a normal file (.jpg or.tif), or as a Photoshop file (Photoshop Layers). If you don't have a favorite photo, open a recent one and go to File > Save. The "Save for Web & Devices" dialog appears. Turn off the embedded profile, if it's on. The "Save for Web & Devices" dialog allows you to choose between a variety of formats, including GIF, JPEG, and WebP, and a variety of output sizes, including Web- and device-optimized sizes. If you are creating an image for the Web, save for the Web. Turn on "Compress images for web" if you want to further optimize the image for the Web by removing unnecessary color information. If you want an image to be playable on an iPhone or iPad in the iPhone/iPad App Store, save in the JPEG-2000 format. 2. 2. Now you're ready to begin. The Save for Web & Devices dialog (Figure 1.1) should include "Yes" for the Photoshop File Format. If it doesn't, find the dialog, and check that "This file is saved in a Photoshop format." The Save for Web & Devices dialog allows you to preview and modify settings on your photos prior to saving them. Figure 1.1: The Save for Web & Devices dialog is where you can adjust the way images will be displayed when they are shared on the Web or posted to social media sites. In Figure 1.2, the dialog is open, and the images are unselected in the Photoshop file (.psd) format. Choose a new file format, as shown in Figure 1.2. In this image, the image size is set to "Large" for an optimal 72-dpi image. If you chose to save to the JPEG-2000 format, the quality will decrease. It might be better to export this image as a PNG at a higher resolution. To choose a new file format, select the format shown in the dialog and choose the size from the drop-down list. Below it, you can choose the resolution or dpi to save the file at. Each change you make results in a new file. (JPEG-2000, while a lossy format, can store more information than, for example, JPG or PNG.) If you wish to export your image as a Web

Seismic event may have 'at least' two legs under it March 6, 2011 An earthquake with at least two distinct legs under it appears to be occurring, but scientists cannot yet pin down the exact date and location of the impending temblor, according to geologists and seismologists from New Zealand and Australia. "It would take a very large seismic moment release for it to fail, but if it comes, it will be a very large event," commented Ralph Bryan, a geologist at the University of New South Wales and vice chairman of the New Zealand Seismic Hazard Group. "There is a 66% chance of magnitude 7 or greater somewhere on the planet on any given day, so it could happen without warning." His team calculated the likelihood of at least two distinct events, with magnitudes of 5.2 to 7.2, occurring within a five-year period anywhere in the world. The probability of such events occurring simultaneously in the same place was much lower, at just 5%. Based on historical patterns, it was assumed that such a simultaneous event would occur in the Indian Ocean — where it is felt regularly — and the American Pacific Northwest, but no such events occurred during the last five-year period. "It's not something to worry about, but it is worth keeping a weather eye on," commented Dr. Bryan, which means most people in the Pacific Northwest should expect a summer festival-like atmosphere as the region makes its transition from winter to spring, with temperatures nearing 40°C (104°F) and moisture-laden Pacific winds blowing down from Canada. When the last great earthquake of the same magnitude occurred in the Pacific Northwest, in 1700, the intense seismic wave that radiated outwards through the region created a tsunami that killed over 1,000 people in the Japanese region of Honshu and damaged buildings as far south as New Zealand. We've all seen the power and influence that technology has over society. The world has been transformed by many technologists throughout human history. Changes in our everyday life from the first pictographs to smart phones, computers, and advanced medicine have dramatically changed society. The world is now less reliant on science and more reliant on technology. Similarly, the world of vape has changed considerably within the last 5 years. In early 2015, the cannabis industry lacked clarity in public perception, was under extreme prohibition, and needed the influx

L'Aquila, Italy (CNN) -- As the clock ticked down toward the moment that the earthquake seemed inevitable, the people of the small town of L'Aquila were preparing for the worst: a series of quakes was expected within a few minutes. Residents climbed into their cars. Many locked themselves into their homes. Some clambered into basements or onto rooftops, hoping to escape the quake. But it was the small building near the center of town -- a supermarket -- that would take their lives, crumpling into a vast, red-and-gray inferno as a barrage of rubble and glass rained down on them. "Do you want to die?" a man shouted to his terrified family. JUST WATCHED Fearing another deadly earthquake Replay More Videos... MUST WATCH Fearing another deadly earthquake 02:31 More than seven years after the "big one" devastated the Italian city of L'Aquila, an intense debate over where responsibility lies in the earthquake that devastated the south of the country a second time in February. For the town, which bore the brunt of the earthquake in 2009 that killed more than 300 people, it's still the matter of "where to go from here." After the 2009 earthquake, survivors were struck by their suffering -- shaken by their inability to come to grips with what the severity of the disaster could mean for them. Much of L'Aquila is still rebuilding. Many of the town's residents remain jobless. Many have spent more than 200 days in bed after the "big one." But some say the deadly earthquake in L'Aquila in 2009 should not be forgotten or repeated. "This year we're here to protest the fact that there is no justice," says Cecilia Molina. "We are here to demand that something is done." A people's movement Molina belongs to a group called the L'Aquila Movement. It is named after the town, which is 15 kilometers (9 miles) southwest of central L'Aquila. It's a people's movement with supporters, including lawyers, doctors, psychologists, clergymen, local politicians and ordinary citizens in their mid-20s and early 30s. "Since 2009, from the moment I became a lawyer, I've been working only with the victims of this earthquake," says Rosanna, a 25-year-old law student. "I didn't realize I'd
