About Us.Q: Memory management with pandas dataframes in python I have a list which consists of data of different length. But there is a rule that elements should not have length more than 2500. So I am using following code to process data. def func(object_list): df_temp = pd.DataFrame(object_list) df_temp.rename(columns={"0_":"year", "1_":"city"}) df_temp.rename(columns={"0_0":"fed"}) df_temp.drop(columns=['0_0']) df_temp.drop(columns=['2_0']) return df_temp My question is how to use the memory efficiently in such a case. Because I have a lot of data. A: You can read the data from a dictionary directly. You have to create the dictionary with keys appropriate to the structure of your data. Here is an example. For your data there are two columns - id and title. For your dataframe you should define the index as id, and use pd.Series.from_dict to convert the key/value structure in the dictionary to data. import pandas as pd import numpy as np d = {'id': [1, 2, 3], 'title': ['hi', 'how are you', 'bye']} df = pd.DataFrame(d) You can retrieve the dataframe using keys with python's dictionary behaviour print(df.loc['hi']) id title 0 1 hi Using this method all the columns will be named, and you can select them using a column name. print(df['title']) id title 0 1 hi If you want to rename all the columns and rename them properly, then you can use the following command df.columns = ['id', 'title'] You can then select columns using the column name. print
